Times Article on Ashcroft: 'Flatteries' Not Included

Last week, The New York Times made short work of my comments about Attorney General John Ashcroft's job performance. When the article was published, I was disappointed to see some of my remarks taken out of context. FRC worked vigorously to defend John Ashcroft during his confirmation hearings, and we continue to hold him in high esteem. Though his record isn't perfect, he has done a good, solid job, which I indicated in my interview with the Times. That assessment didn't make it into the article. The attorney general's contributions to the pro-life, pro-family cause include his challenge of Oregon's euthanasia law, the amicus brief on behalf of Ohio's partial birth abortion ban, and his support of obscenity laws. To illustrate the fact that his record wasn't flawless, I referenced Mr. Ashcroft's apparent affirmation of hate crimes prosecutions, his efforts to extend the Reno injunction against pro-lifers protesting outside abortion clinics, and the DOJ's participation in gay pride activities. I also indicated that in the aftermath of 9-11, conservatives ought to be cautious about embracing proposals that grow government at the expense of individual liberties. Administrations come and go, but government regulations have a way of enduring and will eventually be administered by someone not nearly as sympathetic to our positions as Attorney General Ashcroft.

Senate Reform Bill: Welfare and Square?

Leave it to Senate Democrats to try to take the teeth out of the president's welfare reform bill. Their watered-down version promises to undo the steady improvements in welfare policy--including President Bush's innovative marriage enrichment program, which designates $300 million toward helping couples get married and stay married. The president is adamantly opposed to the Democratic provisions that would eliminate funding for abstinence programs. "In order to help people help themselves, I strongly believe that we must encourage teen abstinence programs. We've got to help people understand that, one, it's OK to abstain. And secondly, having a baby out of wedlock early in life, it's going to make it awfully tough ... on the child, awfully tough on the mom," he said. We're heartened by the president's resolve and urge the Senate to reconsider its legislation on behalf of families struggling to work their way out of poverty.

Schumer's Provision: Morally Bankrupt

There are some pro-life heroes in the House who can always be counted on to stand for what's right. Reps. Chris Smith, Joseph Pitts, Mike Pence, John Shadegg, Jeff Flake, and Todd Akin once again put their political capital on the line for the sanctity of life--and succeeded. When they realized that a provision had been added to the bankruptcy bill that discriminated against non-violent abortion protestors, they lobbied their colleagues to remove it. Their actions may have spared another bill from being infected with Sen. Schumer's anti-life poison.
