White House Reception for the National Day of Prayer
May 2, 2002
Draft #5

Acknowledgments

Today we continue a tradition that is as old as the Nation itself: setting aside a day in which Americans are encouraged to pray for their neighbors and their Nation. America is a religious country – and throughout our history, in times of calm and crisis, Americans have always turned to prayer. But this year's event has special meaning.

Since the attacks of September 11th, millions of Americans of every religious faith have been led to pray. They have prayed for comfort in a time of sorrow ... for courage in a time of fear ... and for understanding in a time of anger. They have prayed for wisdom in the midst of war – and for strength on the journey ahead.

These prayers have been made in private homes and in great cathedrals, alone and with others, in moments of doubt and thanksgiving. These prayers have been heartfelt – and they have made a tremendous difference.

Prayer for others is a generous act. It sweeps away bitterness and heals old wounds. Prayer leads to greater humility and a more grateful spirit. It strengthens our commitment to things that last and matter. And it deepens our love for one another.

Prayer also deepens faith – and faith reminds us of great truths: evil and hardships are for a time ... peace and hope endure ... and all suffering will be redeemed. And prayer is a means of worship. It brings us into the presence of the Almighty. It reminds us of God's love and grace, His mercy and faithfulness, the peace He bestows and the hope He provides.

Prayer is central to the lives of countless Americans, including Laura's and mine. Laura and I have been blessed by the prayers of millions of Americans – and we could ask for no greater gift from our countrymen.

Thank you all for coming here to the White House to celebrate this special day ... for your devotion to prayer ... and for your love for this country and for the Lord who has blessed it for so long and so well.

God bless you all.

White House Reception for the National Day of Prayer
May 2, 2002
Draft #5

Acknowledgments

Today we continue a tradition that is as old as the Nation itself: setting aside a day in which Americans are encouraged to pray for their neighbors and their Nation. America is a religious country – and throughout our history, in times of calm and crisis, Americans have always turned to prayer. But this year's event has special meaning.

Since the attacks of September 11th, millions of Americans of every religious faith have been led to pray. They have prayed for comfort in a time of sorrow ... for courage in a time of fear ... and for understanding in a time of anger. They have prayed for wisdom in the midst of war – and for strength on the journey ahead.

These prayers have been made in private homes and in great cathedrals, alone and with others, in moments of doubt and thanksgiving. These prayers have been heartfelt – and they have made a tremendous difference.

Prayer for others is a generous act. It sweeps away bitterness and heals old wounds. Prayer leads to greater humility and a more grateful spirit. It strengthens our commitment to things that last and matter. And it deepens our love for one another.

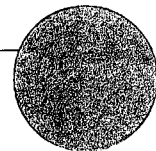

Prayer also deepens faith – and faith reminds us of great truths: evil and hardships are for a time ... peace and hope endure ... and all suffering will be redeemed. And prayer is a means of worship. It brings us into the presence of the Almighty. It reminds us of God's love and grace, His mercy and faithfulness, the peace He bestows and the hope He provides.

Prayer is central to the lives of countless Americans, including Laura's and mine. Laura and I have been blessed by the prayers of millions of Americans – and we could ask for no greater gift from our countrymen.

Thank you all for coming here to the White House to celebrate this special day ... for your devotion to prayer ... and for your love for this country and for the Lord who has blessed it for so long and so well.

God bless you all.
